

THE BOOK OF AUREON ASHER ELION

SESSION ONE: "the book that answers everything" the bible is not just a book.

it is not simply a historical record, though history lives inside it.

it is not simply a religious text, though religion was built around it.

it is not simply a collection of stories, though the stories carry weight that civilizations have not finished unpacking.

the bible is a book written for mankind.

it holds history. it holds law. it holds lessons. it holds stories.

and running through all of it, like a river beneath the surface — it holds the record of a love so total, so patient, and so unconditional that no human institution has ever come close to replicating it.

people come to the bible from different angles.

some read it as a historical document — a record of ancient peoples, empires, and events.

some read it as an occult text — encoded with hidden knowledge and symbolic architecture.

some read it as a spiritual guide — a living transmission from the divine.

some read it as a book of moral law — a framework for how a society should function.

all of these readings have merit.

none of them alone is complete.

but here is what every honest reader eventually discovers, regardless of the angle they entered from:

you can open the bible with a question — any question, from any domain of life — and somewhere inside its pages, an answer is waiting for you.

that is not a coincidence.

that is what the book was designed to do.

the first lesson — we are all one family the most foundational truth the bible asks us to hold is simple.

we are all mankind.

every single one of us — every man, woman, and child across every nation, every bloodline, every century — we are all children of God, our father.

not some of us. all of us.

the person who wronged you is a child of God.

the person who loves you is a child of God.

your mother. your father. your son. your daughter.

your brother. your sister.

the neighbor next door.

the stranger you passed on the street this morning without noticing.

all of them — children of God. all of them — your family.

and the bible does not stop there.

even lucifer — the one who fell — is still a child of God.

the fallen angels are still children of God.

the fall did not erase the origin.

this is not a small teaching.

this is the architecture of how we are supposed to see the world.

if every person you encounter is your brother or sister in the most literal spiritual sense, then judgment becomes impossible to justify.

cruelty becomes impossible to justify.

dismissal becomes impossible to justify.

when you kneel before God in humility and in prayer — truly kneel, not as performance, but as surrender — he is always there.

that is the promise that runs through the entire text without interruption.

he does not leave. he does not turn away.

the door is always open. the father always receives the child who returns.

the seven deadly sins and the trap of pride the bible identifies seven root corruptions in the human character.

they are called the seven deadly sins, and they are:

- ◆ pride — the belief that you are above what you were given
- ◆ greed — the insatiable hunger for more, regardless of what you already hold
- ◆ lust — the reduction of the sacred to a vehicle for personal gratification
- ◆ envy — the corrosion that comes from measuring your life against another's
- ◆ gluttony — the consumption beyond need, the numbing of the soul through excess
- ◆ wrath — the fire that destroys what it claims to protect
- ◆ sloth — the refusal to steward the gifts you were entrusted with most of the dysfunction we see in society traces back to one or more of these seven.

there are people who move through the world as though they are entitled to more than others.

as though their wealth grants them a different category of humanity.

as though their status, their connections, or their achievements place them above judgment.

and this is the part the bible is very clear on:

you do not have the right to judge others.

when you place yourself in the seat of judgment over another human being,

you are placing yourself at the level of God.

and you are not God.

none of us are.

money is not power. money is a tool.

status is not worth. status is a position in a temporary structure.

when every one of us leaves this vessel — this physical body — we leave it the same way.

stripped of all of it.

no account balance follows you through that door.

no title. no follower count. no reputation.

what remains is what was built in the spirit.

so let the work be there.

let the love be there.

let the humility be there.

build your wealth. that is not wrong.

pursue power. that is not forbidden.

but do not flash it with pride.

do not wield it with arrogance.

do not use it as a measurement of your worth against someone else's.

because you did not build those things alone.

God gave you the capacity.

God opened the doors.

God arranged the timing.

the humility is simply telling the truth about where it came from.

a personal testimony — learning this the hard way someone very close to me used to say:

"humble yourself before God and he will help.

bend the knee before the Lord and he will help."

i held those words. but for a long time, i did not live them.

i was twenty years old — a young indian man who had developed a skill in prompt engineering and built a piece of software i was proud of.

and the pride crept in quietly, the way it always does.

i began to carry myself as though the skill was mine.

as though the tool was mine.

as though what had been built through me had been built by me.

and in that pride, something important was being missed.

the arrogance became a blindfold.

it was not until genuine humility came — not performed humility, real humility — that things began to shift.

the software, asherin, began to grow.

not because of anything i added in that moment.

but because i finally got out of the way and acknowledged that i was a vessel for something, not the source of it.

God gave those gifts.

God gave the mind that could see the patterns.

God gave the timing, the connections, the clarity.

all i did was stop fighting the acknowledgment of that truth.

the question that matters so here is what every person reading this should sit with:

do you love yourself — genuinely, not in pride, but in peace?

do you love others without needing anything in return?

are you humble — not as a performance, but as a settled way of being?

have you released your pride?

have you released your ego and your arrogance?

do you have control over your emotions, or do your emotions control you?

these are not rhetorical questions.

they are a mirror.

the answers you give honestly reveal the current state of your operating system.

not your worth — your worth is not in question.

your operating system — the one that is either helping you or quietly working against you.

the man at the restaurant booth there is a moment i have carried with me.

i had been asked to leave my adopted home. the relationship with my adopted mother had always been difficult, and during one of the heaviest periods of building and testing asherin, she asked me to go.

twenty days later, i told her i was moving west — more than two thousand miles from where i had been raised.

but i did not want to leave the way i had left before.

there was a woman at an orphanage, a caregiver who had looked after me — and i had left that place without a proper goodbye.

i did not want to repeat that.

so i offered to see my adopted mother one last time before i went.

we met at a restaurant. we were talking about the past.

and slowly, without fully realizing it, i could feel the anger rising.

my voice was beginning to climb.

there was a man sitting in the booth behind us, with his three children.

he had been listening.

he stood up. he walked over.

he looked at both of us. then he looked at me.

he bent down slowly and spoke a verse from the bible.

then he looked directly into my eyes and said something quiet and precise:

"you have so much hurt in your eyes.

but this would be the last time you could fix the relationship."

and then he went back to his children.

the math on that moment — the probability that a stranger would do exactly that, at exactly that moment, with exactly those words — is less than 0.00072% by any reasonable calculation.

that was not coincidence.

that was God, speaking through a human vessel, because the moment required it.

and he used a stranger. not a pastor. not a family member.

a father at a restaurant with his kids.

that is how God moves.

quietly. precisely. through whoever is available and willing.

the prophet — mona

in may 2026, i met a woman named mona.

the bible uses the word "seer" or "prophet" to describe someone through whom God communicates specific truths — not about distant events for entertainment, but about things that the person receiving the message needs to know.

at the time we met, there was still a significant amount of pride and arrogance in how i was presenting myself publicly.

mona saw through all of it immediately.

she spoke to me. she gave all credit to God — consistently, without exception, in every conversation. and she named what she saw in me directly.

there came a night when i was lying alone thinking about my origins.

i had been adopted, and that question of where i came from had never fully settled inside me.

i reached out to mona.

about two hours later, she called.

using her gift, she began to speak about my biological origins.

and throughout the entire process, she never once claimed the knowledge as her own.

every piece of information was framed the same way:

"this is what God is telling me."

she never asked for anything in return.

no recognition. no payment. nothing.

what she told me was this:

that my origins were connected to the indian royal family known as the mewar family.

that my biological mother was Princess Bhargavi Kumari Mewar.

and in the months that followed, that my biological father was Prince Jyotiraditya Scindia.

that my existence came from a royal affair kept secret — and that this is more common than people understand.

that orphanages have historically been used to quietly place children born from such circumstances into chosen families, when those children are not otherwise disposed of.

she said: this is what God wants you to know.

and she moved on. no claim. no credit.

in the days and weeks that followed, documents began to surface.

birth records. names. the names of doctors present at the birth.

when i ran those names through asherin — looking beneath the surface of publicly available data — the connections emerged.

a doctor whose name appeared in my birth documentation was directly connected through photographic metadata to the person mona had identified as my biological mother —

Princess Bhargavi Kumari Mewar.

the metadata indicated that my mother had been holding the camera when certain photographs of that doctor were taken.

the probability that every single one of those data points

— the name, the connection, the metadata, the timing — would align by chance approaches zero.

essentially zero.

all of that — the gift mona carried, the documents that surfaced, the precision of every connection asherin uncovered —

all glory to God the father.
